Layers are a great way to organize your image without overwriting what has already been done on a photo. Once you have multiple layers organized, you can use the Layers panel to hide the layers so they are not visible by themselves, as well as delete unused layers and arrange the remaining layers as needed. Layers are what makes Photoshop really work. Without them, the image would just look the same. Layers are also used to organize the layers used in an image.

Studio B is a first-floor restaurant and bar that recently reopened after a three-year hiatus, as noted in Eater Chicago. The restaurant comes from chef Peter Brown, who formerly operated his restaurant The Aviary in the Loop. According to a restaurant owner we contacted, Bistro Sable is a hybrid space that shares space with domestic and international entertainment venues. The restaurant is not technically a lounge; you will be too busy working to get wasted in the bar. The menu features very American regional fare with a strong French influence; Brown, who previously worked with Chef Chris Kramer at The Aviary, has been noted for using regional ingredients and cooking methodologies at his restaurants. Brown previously worked at restaurant Alinea under chef Grant Achatz, though Bistro Sable shares very few similarities with Alinea. Like Alinea, Bistro Sable is not an evening experience; it is a space for people to gather and celebrate, not a destination for drinking. The restaurant has a pre-theater section adjacent to the bar that features small plates like fried chicken and mac-and-cheese sliders, as well as fried chicken and hamburgers, that are meant to be eaten in between periods of performance and drinks. The bar and dining room share a mural by local artist Ksenia Kovan that depicts a cartoon robot eating a salad. The mural previously hung at The Aviary, and at Bistro Sable, it has been covered over because of its off-putting appearance. Tuesday, April 21, 2006 The objective is to draw for the sake of making art (rather than drawing for a particular subject - and if there is no desire to work up a 2 page spread, we don't have to fool around creating a landscape or abstract when the real issue should be a character - a body or at least a silhouette). In our 3 columns (2-page spreads) we (or our class mates) will have a day to draw a particular subject (a wide brush, a child, a close up of a face or a scene, whatever we feel like). In each class the teacher will use the spread as a guideline for the class to work towards, but he will put some restrictions on the subject and overall style. Wednesday, April 01, 2006 Browsing through the internet I came across this an interesting blog entry regarding issues with free application / desktop publishing software that I hadn't previously known. "I've been following DTP around for a while now as a hobby and at the start (a few years back) I really used to think that the apps I was using to do my work were the best, and I didn't want to go back to Illustrator or Photoshop for my drawings, as those are professional apps. Sure I'd like to have a tablet and paper and be working as a proper illustrator or designer, but that's life I guess. But then a few years ago I got fed up with the way I was doing my work and I bought some digital pen tablets (a Stady, a pressure sensitive Kaadu, and an old Wacom Bamboo). I was amazed to find that I actually liked drawing on them a LOT more than I did on paper and it just became my daily drawing practice. I think the main problem with desktop publishing software is that they are designed for people who want to write content, not as a drawing tool (myself included). On the other hand, the apps like Illustrator, Photoshop, Photoshop Elements or GIMP are designed as drawing tools and can be used for writing content but they're not great for writing on. Why? I mean, in the end, if you have a computer there's no reason why you should use content apps, if you use a pen and paper to draw and make marks, you can actually, ya know, write content. I know we can't expect Adobe's Design Suite, Quark, and so on to step in and
