Hypoxic damage of the central nervous system (CNS) is one of the most common complications after cardiopulmonary surgery and a variety of pathological conditions. Although mechanical damages due to hypotension or anoxia are relatively easy to understand, the nature of the functional and biochemical alterations and the mechanisms underlying the CNS damages have remained poorly elucidated. Using a cardiopulmonary bypass model of hypoxia in the rat, we attempted to address the relationship between oxygen supply and neuronal function, and the factors responsible for neuronal injury. Hypoxic damage of CNS was revealed by histochemical analysis (thioflavine S and TOTO-3). The hypoxic brain damage was observed in rats subjected to hypoxia for either short period (10 min) or long period (60 min). The brain damage was more severe after 60-min hypoxia than 10-min hypoxia. Histological studies revealed micro-infarction in the neocortex and hippocampus, loss of neurons in the neocortex, diencephalon and hindbrain, and edema of the entire brain after 60-min hypoxia. The degree of brain damage was correlated with the level of ATP, total adenine nucleotide, and hypoxanthine in the cerebral cortex. The levels
