

"How we use this data isn't just for the players or for players versus players," explained FIFA U20 World Cup technical director Eduard Mateos. "It's for players on the pitch versus the referees and the other coach. We analyse the game and understand the thought process behind referee decisions and how opponents use their technical characteristics to gain an advantage." "We wanted to create the best refereeing game in the world," added Mateos. "It's not just referee decision review. We are creating a set of tools that can be used by coaching staff and players to provide the best playing conditions. HyperMotion technology uses motion capture data collected from 22 real-life players playing a complete, high-intensity football match in motion capture suits. "It's both in-game and out of game data," added Mateos. One example that has come to light is the decision to award a penalty kick to Mexico in the second round of their U20 World Cup semi-final against England. La Pulga being a favourite of FIFA head referee Graham Poll at the time, Mexico were favourites to progress. England, after an intense match, were determined to take all three points and push for a place in the final. On a bright sunny afternoon on Reims' pitch, Mexico had created several chances, despite playing in a predominantly humid environment. Aaron Martin's free kick hit the hand of an England goalkeeper and rebounded into the path of Aguilera, who tapped in from close range. Referee Poll, in his post-match report, stated, "He thought the ball had been pushed into him and the only reason he had not aimed his kick at the goal is that the ball was still in play." FIFA U20 World Cup technical director Eduard Mateos. With the last two seconds ticking away in the match, Mexico drew the match. England coach Alex Miller asked FIFA how the La Pulga decision had been made. "He had seen the replay and asked me why it was not a penalty," explained Mateos. "Then he went for the table and told me the exact position of the hand of the goalkeeper. He said, 'How is it possible?' "There are examples of this happening at other tournaments. There was one decision in the World
