AlignedTirStripsCorelDraw, What's New in the. from the CoRIS users with a more recent date of diabetes diagnosis. However, the inclusion of those with first diabetes diagnosis at  $\geq 30$  years, only those with available height and weight data, and those with diagnosed diabetes only at ages  $\geq 40$  years will introduce some selection, and limit the generalisability to those who have type 2 diabetes. The rapid changes in the size and age structure of the Australian population \[@pmed.1003040.ref060\] will also introduce selection bias, particularly as uptake of diabetes testing is likely to vary by age and diabetes status. In the CoRIS, diabetes diagnosis is ascertained through the clinical records of general practice, and the majority of participants reported their diabetes status to be known to their general practitioner or other medical practitioner. However, we have not been able to rule out the potential effect of misclassification or undetected or undiagnosed diabetes \[@pmed.1003040.ref061\]. We do not have data on individual medical or medication history, which may affect diabetes risk assessment and delay or prevent diagnosis.

However, these factors are likely to be equalised across regions, and the strength of the association of the health measures with diabetes are likely to vary across regions.

We used the HbA1c concentration to estimate the diabetes status of the participants. HbA1c tends to remain stable during the 3 years following diabetes diagnosis \[[@pmed.1003040.ref062],[@pmed.1003040.ref063]\
