From the January 2011 through December 2012 period, 139 patients were seen for RMD, with 80.3% of those patients (116 patients) diagnosed with depressive disorder. Concurrent depressions were found in 10.8% of patients being treated for insomnia (19 patients), 14.4% with co-occurring anxiety (25 patients), and 7.9% with both of these disorders (14 patients). The authors note that this is the first study to examine the comorbidities of insomnia and depression in a large population of patients. The findings show that insomnia commonly co-occurs with depressive disorder and that sleep disturbance may reflect a broader set of problems than previously believed. The authors go on to suggest that diagnosis and treatment of the comorbid insomnia-depression should be considered, as it may improve treatment efficacy. Anxiety disorders are significantly associated with insomnia. The presence of insomnia in patients with panic disorder is widely acknowledged

I've spent my career as a brand developer and business brand architect and I'm constantly amazed at the number of businesses that still operate with outdated brand identity systems. You're already using the right tools to help you with all of your marketing, whether it's social media, branding or traditional advertising, but if your brand identity system is out of date, outdated and doesn't reflect your branding programs, it's either working against you or, more likely, causing problems in your sales and communications processes. You can fix the problems, but the first step is to recognize them. Here are eight of the most common brand identity problems and how to fix them. #1: Branding Systems Are Out of Date and Inconsistent It's not at all uncommon for brands and business owners to have inconsistent brand identity systems. They have one person (or a brand team) in charge of brand identity and they make decisions based on what they think will help their business. That's fine — most people are good at coming up with effective marketing strategies — but brand identity systems are supposed to be designed by the individual with the most knowledge of the organization and their products or services. Consistency is key, and I can't count how many different brand identities I've seen businesses create over the years — a logo, multiple website designs, inconsistent social media updates and more. #2: You Have Too Many Identities Too many brands mean the system is simply flawed and a sign that you're not getting the business branding you need. Think about it: If someone is selling you a product or service, you want to know what they're selling, you want to be able to purchase it and, more importantly, you want a way to keep track of it so you can get it back again. What brand is a free open source astrometry and astrophysics suite, being developed by Collaborative International Astronomical Research Centre. While the driver is a public astrometric raw data processing. Stellarium[1] can be considered as a general astrometric software, however as the software was originally meant for visualisation, navigation, 3D modelling, etc., it was designed to interface with most common software packages, and it certainly can be used for these purposes. Stellarium is available for several different archetypal computer architectures: Windows, Mac OS X, Linux (Debian based distributions, Fedora, CentOS, openSUSE, Arch, redhat-7), BSD and Solaris. Especially Linux distributions can have a customized package repository. Stellarium's quick start guide to "Getting Started" is therefore made for Linux and Linux distributions. == Architecture == This step-by-step guide describes some Ubuntu Linux step-by-step installation steps for Stellarium, using the 1.16.2 version of the software available at the time of writing. Before doing the installation, the user must update its system following the steps specified in the Guiding principle 1. setting up a working directory. 2.

installing the required software. 3. configuring the software. 4. enabling the database and removing old installation. The GPG version used is a custom one (E4F6 5A9C CFBB F5A5 1C9F 60B4 A2C5 D2E5 E007 CFB8 F608). == Intalling == 1. Setting a working directory and execute GPG. 2. Execute the GPG installation command. 3. Executing the fast installer command. 4. The command prompt will open, displaying a directory listing. If an error occurs during this process, please report it or alternatively please contact the Stellarium developer by sending an email to starry@cis.uniroma2.it. == Updating GPG == 1. GPG will automatically generate a new keypair for Stellium. 2. If a key already exists, GPG is using it.
