The prior art contains a large number of bird feeders, some of which are of the type here under consideration while most are not. Common features of the several types of feeders that do exist include the provision of a cage or nest for the birds and, if desired, the provision of an area around the cage or nest where the bird may "land" and feed. While bird feeders can be of a considerable variety, they usually contain some form of reservoir for holding the bird food and a delivery system such as a wick or gravity feeding which transports the food into the cage or nest where the birds can eat it. The food is usually provided in a concentrated form, such as in the form of a block of seeds. The birds may select the pieces of food from the reservoir and eat it, with or without the aid of the delivery system. If a wick is used, the wick is usually of the kind which burns slowly and feeds the birds continuously. The delivery of food by gravity is achieved by the use of a delivery system which is usually of the type which contains a bottomless container for the food and a wick which delivers the food from the bottomless container by capillary action. The food is usually introduced in the dry, powdered state in the bottomless container but it may also be provided in any other form such as the so-called "soft food". This latter form is a heavy emulsion of such materials as oil, syrup, salt and bread crumbs which are mixed with water and may be served in the cup or plate that holds the dry food. The birds do not usually eat the dry food but they do eat the soft food. The bottomless container must be replenished at regular intervals by the user so that it does not run out. A bird feeder of the type under consideration usually comprises a base which supports the bottomless container. Also the base has a cavity which receives the bird's cage or nest. The user inserts the bottomless container into this cavity in such a manner that 6d1f23a050
